A Cicada's Cry

静けさや	Shizukesaya	Lonely stillness—
岩に滲み入る	Iwa ni shimiiru	a single cicada's cry
蟬の声	Semi no koe	sinking into stone¹

I LOVE KYOTO! Of course, Kyoto is a city of great historic and religious importance. It was the imperial capital of Japan for centuries and the site of many political and military conflicts. It is also the home of hundreds, if not thousands of Buddhist temples, including the Hongwanji, the mother temple of our own branch of Jōdo Shinshū. Kyoto also has personal importance to me. It is where I studied for many years and received ordination from the Hongwanji. It is where I met many of my wonderful Dharma teachers and friends. It is also the place where Diane and I met, got married, and spent our honeymoon years.

Kyoto is now a bustling and ever-changing metropolitan area. But old Kyoto is very slow to change. Many temples, and houses, have stood for centuries. As you walk through the old neighborhoods, you get the sense that in Kyoto the traditional ways are still alive and still valued. Kyoto also has its own rhythm, smell and sounds. You can feel it in the old streets, smell it in the ever-present incense, and hear it in the Kyoto dialect (Kyōtoben), which is still spoken by old-time residents. And sounds of nature, which can be heard once in a while in the big city din, draw your thoughts back to earlier times, as they did for Bashō (1644-1694) the great haiku poet, who wrote, "Even in Kyoto, / how I long for old Kyoto / when the cuckoo sings."²

Bashō's haiku resonate with the sounds of nature, and through his aural imagery, we rediscover our own nature. The poem above places me in the solitary stillness of a summer's day, lost in my thoughts. Suddenly the voice of a cicada cries out, and that sound of life pierces into my stone-like heart, opening it up to the existence of all things. Perhaps Bashō suggests that the voice of the Buddha can be heard in the cicada's cry and the cicada's cry is, at this moment for me, the voice of the Buddha. "Even temple bells / seem to be ringing in / the cicada's cry."³

And then Bashō tells us more: A cicada's cry is the sound of both the limitation and the infinite potential of life itself.

There are many varieties of cicada's throughout the world and most have distinct features. Cicadas can live for many years, but mostly underground. In Japan, cicadas emerge from the ground during the late summer in order to find mates. In order to do so, they emit a high-pitched buzzing sound, the "voice" or "cry" of the cicada. Another notable feature is that, once above ground, cicadas only live for a very brief time. In August the cries of millions of cicadas can be heard everywhere in Kyoto. That is the sound of summer in Japan for me, but for Bashō it was something more. As this famous haiku tells us, it is the cry of life itself—sensing its brevity and singing of its infinite value in each moment, this moment.

やがて死ぬ	/	けしきは見えず	/	蟬の声
Yagate shinu	/	keshiki wa miezu	/	semi no koe
Nothing in the cry / of cicadas suggests they / are about to die.⁴

And what about us? Are we able to hear the voice of the Buddha in the cicada's cry?

Buddha Nature and Rodney King

By Diane Ames

One could make a case that Shinran believed we all have the potential to develop Buddha nature even if we do not seem to be manifesting it just now. A passage in the Kyogyoshinsho likens it to the butter that might come out of cream, given the right conditions. The cream may just sit there not acting the least bit like butter until its shelf life comes to an end, or it may suddenly give birth to butter if it is sufficiently shaken up, which metaphor may be apt for the case of the late Rodney King (1965-2012).

Just about everybody considered Rodney King a loser. He had served time for a robbery during which he panicked, hit the owner of the store he was robbing with a wooden pole, and got caught, all over $200. He was also an alcoholic whose habit of driving under the influence led to multiple disasters for himself and sometimes for others. His family was alienated. Two wives left him in disgust. His life seemed a hopeless mess.

Then one night in Los Angeles in 1991, King was pulled over on yet another DUI. Being drunk out of his mind, he led the police on a car chase. When caught, he resisted being forced to lie on the ground. But he did nothing to justify the 56 baton blows and 6 kicks, causing multiple fractures and damage to the kidneys and brain, that the officers proceeded to inflict. A bystander secretly videotaped the beating. The tape appeared on TV, causing outrage and inspiring a movement to combat police brutality. It also caused some of the policemen involved to be put on trial for use of excessive force. When a jury from Simi Valley, an area full of resident policemen, acquitted them, rioting broke out in poor African-American neighborhoods in L.A. and other cities over suspicions that it all had something to do with King's black skin. In six days of violence that came to involve black, Hispanic, and white rioters, 53 people were killed.

Obviously nobody had more reason to be mad about police brutality than Rodney King. Yet after two days of watching what the media called the Rodney King riots, he appeared on television to plead in tears for an end to the bloodshed, sobbing, eloquently, "Can't we all just get along?" And the nation was moved.

The working of the Buddha nature in human life has been compared to the little light that finds its way through the clouds on even the darkest day. Or, one might add, in even the most benighted life. May Rodney King rest in peace.
